

An aerial, historical-style illustration of a town, likely Butler, Ohio. The town is built on a hillside overlooking a wide river. A prominent bridge with multiple arches spans the river. The town is densely packed with buildings, including a large church with a tall steeple. In the foreground, there are green fields, trees, and a few cows grazing. A fence line runs across the middle ground. The overall scene is a detailed representation of a 19th-century town.

Butler County, Ohio

Butler County was formed in 1803, the same year Ohio became the 17th state. The county was named for Revolutionary War General Richard Butler. He was killed fighting Indians four years before the 1795 Treaty of Greenville opened the Miami Valley to new settlers.

The new county was located just north of Cincinnati, a major gateway for migration to the Northwest Territory. It prospered throughout the 19th and 20th centuries with major industry, commerce, and prominent cities as well as profitable agriculture.

In the 21st century Butler County and its communities are experiencing significant revitalization. Museums, historic sites, historical societies, history research facilities and related organizations tell its fascinating story. This booklet is a guide to unique architecture, significant artifacts, original documents, changing exhibits and public programs. We encourage you to explore the county's rich history and heritage.
